send emails, text messages, and join online communities. These forms of communication are quickly reducing the number of phone calls, faxes and letters that we write. These new technologies are changing the ways in which we communicate. For one, face-to-face communication is decreasing. Also, new abbreviated language is being introduced into quick messages that do not permit time for long-winded explanations. Not to mention the fact that people are drawn closer into association with people and spheres of society that they were members or friends move away the sheer increase in the amount of communication keeps people connected. However, while this does create more convenience it also carries the potential of burdening people with heightened demands. For instance, the time expected for one to reply to a message is being shortened drastically from what it may have been in decades past. This may require people to perform tasks quicker or make decisions hastily in order to make a reply in a shortened period of time. On the other hand, we may all just evolve to be more efficient. People may also feel a growing responsibility to keep everyone in their circle of friends and family informed on a more frequent basis. It will be a shame if

next to my grandma. At first she was awake and we talked a bit. She told me to shut off the TV and go to sleep. Then she fell peacefully asleep. I kept looking at her and was jealous, because I knew I wouldn't be sleeping at all tonight. And on top of that I had an early morning. So I just kept watching the clock and thinking how in a few more hours I'd should get up. I kept repeating almost every place the time expires sometimes a book watching. I did have early. And up I felt sleep and thirsty.
